“Cole is a literary performance artist, his words meticulously chosen and deployed with elegance and force. To read, see, and travel with him is to be changed by the questions that challenge him.”

•Publishers Weekly “Cole’s insights cast fresh light on even the most quotidian of objects . . . [and his] collection performs an important service by elevating public discourse in an unsettled time.”

•Booklist (starred review) “A terrific collection of essays from one of our greatest public intellectuals.”

•Vox “Cole’s writing is masterful and lyrical and politically and socially engaged, and he is probably one of the most interesting African writers at work today.”

•Chris Abani, author of Graceland and The Face “The forms of resistance depend on the culture they resist, and in our era of generalizations and approximations and sloppiness, Teju Cole’s precise and vivid observation and description are an antidote and a joy. This is a book written with a scalpel, a microscope, and walking shoes, full of telling details and sometimes big surprises.”

•Rebecca Solnit, author of Men Explain Things to Me “Absolutely wonderful . . . Teju Cole is so erudite, so laser sharp, that his intelligence shimmers, but best of all, his personality shines through as being kind and generous. I found myself transported and moved deeply.”

•Petina Gappah, author of The Book of Memory

Teju Cole was born in the United States in 1975 and raised in Nigeria. He is the author of Every Day Is for the Thief and Open City, which won the PEN/Hemingway Award, the Internationaler Literaturpreis, the Rosenthal Family Foundation Award for Fiction from the American Academy of Arts and Letters, and the New York City Book Award, and was nominated for the National Book Critics Circle Award. His photography has been exhibited in India and the United States. He is Distinguished Writer in Residence at Bard College.

With concern, compassion, and vast insight and intelligence, Teju Cole’s essays engage a wide range of subjects. The book’s first section shines a bright lens on the work of literary giants such as Baldwin, Tranströmer, Walcott, Naipaul, and Sebald. Cole nicely blends his own experiences into his literary examinations. In section two, his passion (bordering on obsession) is the art of photography. It is a joy to read how he discusses famous photos with the keen eye of a poet. By the book’s third section, Cole turns his attention into that of an activist, as he bears witness to the politics and turmoil around the globe. Startling and frightening pieces, such as “A Reader’s War,” address the horror of drone strikes and what these attacks say about our moral stature. In another powerful piece called "In Alabama," Cole reminds us that "no generation is free of the demands of conscience," as he links the bloodshed of the Civil Rights movement to the modern epidemic of young black men murdered by police. Another piece such as "Bad Laws" takes an illuminating look at the perpetual crisis between the unjustly-treated Palestinians and the law-enforcing Israelis. Some of the shorter pieces pack just as much intensity. Cole addresses torture in South Africa during apartheid in one piece and the demolition of ancient statues by the Taliban in another. He recounts heartbreaking stories of mob violence in Nigeria, and he concludes the book with the sorrowful fates of immigrants and migrant workers trying to cross the U.S. border. After reading Known and Strange Things, you're compelled to give deeper reflection to the world at large. The beauty of Cole's words and the depth of his ideas are at once inspiring and empowering.

A powerful yet gentle collection of essays that introduced me to people I didn't know (like some of the photographers) and people I knew like Naipaul and Baldwin. Lyrical is the word that keeps coming back to my mind.

Essays that delve deeply into the ordinary and the not-so-ordinary. Thoughts that force the reader to think beyond the ordinary.

This book of essays by Teju Cole aren't always essays: they might be scraps of thought, well-digested and to an immediate point. They are fiercely intelligent, opinionated, meaningful in a way that allow us to get to the heart of how another thinks. And does he think! Let's be frank: many of us don't do enough thinking, and Cole shows us the way it can be done in a way that educates, informs, and excites us. The work in this volume are nonfiction pieces published in a wide variety of outlets and that he chose from an eight-year period of travel and almost constant writing. The emphasis in these pieces, he tells us in the Preface, is on "epiphany." We can enjoy kernels of ideas that may have had a long gestation, but have finally burst onto the scene with a few sentences but little heavy-handedness or any of the weight of "pronouncements." This reads like a bared heart in the midst of negotiating life, as James Baldwin says in The Fire Next Time, "as nobly as possible, for the sake of those coming after us." Cole references Baldwin in all these pieces in his unapologetic gaze, but he does so explicitly in several pieces, notably "Black Body" in which he tells of visiting the small town in Switzerland, Leukerbad (or Loèche-les-Bains), where Baldwin's "Go Tell It on the Mountain" found its final form. Cole expands on his time in Switzerland in "Far Away From Here," which might be my favorite of these essays. Cole tells how he was given six months to live and write in Zurich and though he did precious little writing, he was totally absorbed every day, gazing at the landscape, walking the mountains, photographing the crags, trails, and lakes, thinking, unfettered. This is someone who carries all he needs in his head, and I loved that freedom as much as he. But how can I choose a favorite from among these pieces when each spoke of ways to approach a subject with which we have struggled or haven't yet? About race and class: "how little sense of shame [Americans] seemed to have," he writes, looking at America from his upbringing in Lagos. Cole echoes Baldwin again in "Bad Laws" about Israel and its laws concerning the rights of Palestinians: "The reality is that, as a Palestinian Arab, in order to defend yourself against the persecution you face, not only do you have to be an expert in Israeli law, you also have to be a Jewish Israeli and have the force of the Israeli state as your guarantor. Israel uses an extremely complex legal and bureaucratic apparatus to dispossess Palestinians of their land, hoping perhaps to forestall accusations of a brutal land grab. Earlier Baldwin reminded us that 'few liberals have any notion of how long, how costly, and how heartbreaking a task it is to gather the evidence that one can carry into court [to prove malfeasance, official or not], or how long such court battles take.' Americans looking at Israel and Palestine should be able to discern some outline of our own justifications and methods, and vice versa. Photography is one of Cole's special interests and he is eloquent in Section Two "Seeing Things" in discussing what makes great photography as opposed to the "dispiriting stream of empty images [that the] Russians call 'poshlost' fake emotion, unearned nostalgia." And then he discusses "Death in the Browser Tab," wherein he tells us what he sees and what he knows after retracing the steps caught by the phone footage recording Walter Scott being shot in the back by eight bullets from a .45-caliber Glock 21. Politics is what humans do, though "the sheer quantity of impacted bullshit in politics" is clearly not something Cole relishes. In "The Reprint" Cole admits he did not vote until sixteen years after he was eligible, and when he did vote finally, for Obama, "like a mutation that happens quietly on a genetic level and later completely alters the body's function, I could feel my relationship to other Americans changing. I had a sense" "dubious to me for so long, and therefore avoided. He notes that Obama was not an angry black man, the son of slaves but a biracial outsider who invisibly worked his way to the center of the political establishment piggybacking the experience of American blacks by hiding in plain sight. The night Obama won, Cole was in Harlem. There was an exuberant and unscripted outpouring of joy as I ever expect to see anywhere. Black presidents are no novelty for to me. About half my life, the half I lived in Nigeria, had been spent under their rule, and, in my mind, the color of the president was neither here nor there. But this is America. Race mattered. Cole will speak out in "A Reader's War" against Obama and his clandestine brand of justice and his ominous, discomfiting, illegal, and immoral use of weaponized drones against defenseless strangers done for our sakes. He admits that Obama believes he is trying "to keep us safe, and I know our enemies are not all imaginary. I am grateful to those whose bravery keeps us safe. It is one of the most difficult questions about political and military power that we face today and Cole wrestles the issue heroically. Not any of us have yet answered this question well, and until we do, the disconnect between justice and drone strikes will continue to plague us. We have unleashed a terrible swift sword on far away lands while we continue to suffer the brutality of a thousand cuts from our own citizens. Cosmic justice? When Cole talks about literature I experience a frisson. There is nothing quite like someone very clever and well-spoken addressing something about which one cares deeply. His insights add to my pleasure, and detract nothing. His description of the poetry of Derek Walcott remind me of the first time I encountered Walcott's work: "This is poetry with a painterly hand, stroke by patient stroke. I have forever thought of Walcott in this way, in color and in motion: turquoise and pale yellow, cool beige and hibiscus pink, the palest gray and an ethereal green I am not sure is water, air, or sea grass. The ocean creates tides through his work, and it seems so fresh. When Cole writes of his visit to V.S. Naipaul in "Natives on the Boat," we sense how Cole's initial reserve is eventually won over by Naipaul's deeply curious and wide-ranging questions. In the very next essay, "Housing Mr. Biswas," Cole writes an ecstatic celebration of Naipaul's accomplishment in creating the "smart and funny, but also often petulant, mean, and unsympathetic Mr. Biswas in Trinidad, an important island in the Caribbean but not a particularly influential one on the world stage. The times and places—the farms, the roads, the villages, the thrumming energy of the city, the mornings, afternoon, dusks, and nights—are described with profound and vigilant affection. It brings to startling fruition in twentieth century Trinidad the promise of the nineteenth century European novel. He's right of course. Naipaul is a beloved writer of a type of novel no longer written, and perhaps now not often read. Reading all these essays in one big gulp was a lot to digest so I am going to recommend a slower savoring. This is a book one must own and keep handy for those small moments when one wants a short, sharp shock of something wonderful. By all means read it all at once so you know where to go back to when you can dig up copies of some of the photos he talks about or want to recall how Cole manages in so few words to convey so much meaning. His is a voice thoughtful in expressing what he sees and yet so vulnerable and human I want to say—read this—this man is what's been missing from your lives. These collected essays will be published August 9, 2016. I read the e-galley provided to me by Netgalley and Random House. I note that some of the essays about art or photography that were initially published in newspapers sometimes were accompanied by examples of the work he discusses. In a perfect world, these would be included in the final book, but truthfully, his writing is clear and compelling enough to not make that nicety strictly necessary. Apologies to the publisher for quoting from a galley: my excuse is that the work is previously published and therefore no surprise.

Wonderful essays. Will definitely recommend
