The All-American Girls After The AAGPBL: How Playing Pro Ball Shaped Their Lives

Synopsis

The hit 1992 film A League of their Own made the All-American Girls Professional Baseball League famous. But the players' stories remain largely untold. The 600 women who played for the AAGPBL through the 1940s and 1950s enjoyed a rare opportunity to lead independent lives as well-paid professional athletes. Their experiences in the league led many to education and careers they never imagined. As teachers, coaches and role models, they strove to broaden the horizons of girls and young women. Many continued to be involved in athletics, supporting the efforts leading to Title IX and the women's sports revolution. Today, they are dedicated to preserving the history of women in baseball and creating opportunities for girls to play.

Customer Reviews

"Dr. Williams set out to answer a question from her students who asked her for real life examples of how sports made a larger difference in women's lives. This book is the result of that research and readers will be amazed and inspired by the stories they read. There can be no doubt after reading about the careers of the players that their lives were transformed. With a focus on economics, travel, education and patriotism readers will never again wonder about the transforming power of sports." --Leslie Heaphy, Kent State University at Stark, editor of Encyclopedia of Women and Baseball

Kathie D. Williams is associate professor of history at Marshall University in Huntington, West Virginia and president of the International Women's Baseball Center.

This is an awesome read. The author does an excellent job of sharing the history in a format that reads like a story.

You can tell how much Williams loves these women. Her stories about them, past and present, are wonderful. If you ever need fuel for an argument about why sports matters, this will stock you up. Also, you might just recognize yourself in her discussion of "sport identity"!

good product with high quality. very good . Satisfied. Good product and good service. as a gift to my colleague,
